Techniques To Stay Away From Claims That You Are Running A Bad Site

Avoiding claims of a being a bad site is quite a simple task. Maintain your site to high standards and keep it running well. Very easy, but what does that mean?

Write Good Posts – Be sure that that you are posting genuine new content regularly. Your posts should be written by you yourself manually and in good English (or whatever language you write in). If you are typing up directly into yourblog's admin, install a spell checker into the toolbar and once you have finished your writing click the button to check the spelling, correcting the errors identified. Better still, if impending write in an application for instance Word in which spelling and grammatical errors are immediately identified.

Ensure that that you take the time to read your posts before you submit them to check for obvious errors and swat up on your grammar and punctuation skills, perhaps even get someone else to proof read for you.

Other people's work – Whilst it is fine to include the odd post from directory web-sites (as long as you stick within their limits of reprints) make certain that you include the original author's biography in whatever form they require. There is no point claiming their work is yours – it is bad practice and if your readers notice, they will flee. Be certain that for every article from a directory that you post you write several of your own to prevent the website looking like a spamblog.

One of the worst blogging 'crimes' is scraping information from other sites. Do not do it! These automated post writing systems are bad and should always be avoided.

Balance advertising – We all love a bit of straightforward cash, but keep it in balance. For advertising on the page merely place adverts in one or two blocks on the page. Any more is too in your face and might be counter productive – readers stop coming back and do not trust the adverts so don't click them.

If you are writing paid posts then make sure that your weblog does not consist of merely sponsored posts. Aim to write at least 2 genuine content posts of a reasonable size for every paid post that you place and be sure that that you are clear that several of your posts are sponsored.

Check Your Comments – If you are not watching every new comment that is posted on your site then you might find a whole array of unsavoury comments are being left on your posts. Whilst obviously not your doing, the lack of removal of these comments will reflect badly on yourblog . Take action to review all comments from new comment makers and as a lot of comments as impending from those that have previously commented.
